children until you find what works for them. My eldest daughter just magically read books - natural ability and plenty of family reading time were, in my opinion, the cause - she didn't often sound words or like to play word games. My younger daughter was very interested in acoustics lessons and kept asking to play rhyming word games and classes. Word family really appealed to her and to this day (grade 6) enjoys word-based puzzles like word searches and crosswords (my eldest daughter would rather play football "smile"). My advice: good luck, don't get frustrated and try to learn well with your children – only if you think it's all figured out, the next one will be completely different. If you decide a family word (also known as an analogy of acoustics) may be something you want to try, read on! As I approach verbal families, I like to learn them in sets that have some similarity (for example, short sounds or long e-sounds). It is easier for children to create their own rhymes, sentences and such when they have two or three verbal families to use together. Still, Sometimes I make a single-word family when I see children struggling with something special - for the first time we did long vowels instead of, for example, short vowels. I also try to keep word families that are too similar in different groups (for example, I wouldn't do a long a/air/and/are/family word together). With my girls, I discovered that they were too confused when the words sounded the same, but they were written differently (like hare and hair). I saved this kind of science for grades 4 and 5 when we started talking about synonyms, antonyms, and homonyms. Anyway, here are the Word Family sets as I suggest combining them.
